BIOGRAPHY OF DADA KATE DZIDZORNU-NYAMADI

On a Tuesday, 78 years ago in Konongo, Ashanti Region, the cry of a baby girl was heard in the home of Madam Jessy Tete Awusa and Mr. Martins Kwashie Dzidzornu. That cry marked the beginning of the life journey of Dada Kate Dzidzornu-Nyamadi, affectionately known to her family and loved ones as Dadaa Kate, whose story we share today.

Dadaa Kate spent the earliest years of her life in Konongo with her family and her brother, Stephen Ababio Dzidzornu. In the course of time, the family left Konongo and relocated to Asadame. What should have been the beginning of a new chapter soon became a difficult season for the young family when their father fell ill and later passed away.

The loss of her husband deeply affected their mother, Jessy Tete Awusa. In the period that followed, she relocated with her children to Tadzewu, where the family began rebuilding their lives.

It was in Tadzewu that Jessy met Walter Agropa, an Apostles Revelation Society (A.R.S.) pastor, whom she later married. Their marriage brought another child into the family, Beatrice Agoropa, Dadaa Kate's half-sister. This period also marked the beginning of Dadaa Kate's early connection with the A.R.S., a church that would remain an important part of her life for many years to come.

Dadaa Kate and her brother began their early education in Tadzewu, attending nursery and kindergarten. Their stay there, however, would not be permanent.

As part of the missionary work of the A.R.S., Walter Agropa was transferred to Dodi Papase, in what is now the Oti Region, formerly part of the Volta Region, and the family moved with him.

At Dodi Papase, Dadaa Kate entered Class One. She was remembered as one of the brilliant pupils in her class, with a particular ability in mathematics. She progressed to Class Two, but it was at this point that the course of her education changed.

Members of her mother's family came for her with the promise that they would further her education. With that hope, Dadaa Kate left Dodi Papase and was taken to Ho Housing in the Volta Region, where she stayed with her aunt.

Unfortunately, the promise of continuing her education did not materialise, and her formal schooling came to an early end in Class Two. Although her time in the classroom was brief, it was not without impact. Dadaa Kate was able to read and write in Ewe, a skill she retained throughout her life. Her classroom education may have ended much earlier than expected, but life itself would continue to teach and shape her.

Ho became another important stop in her journey. From there, as she grew older, life eventually brought her to Accra, opening another significant chapter in her story.

While in Accra, Dadaa Kate met Mr. Daniel Nyamadi, who later became her husband. In the 1970s, their marriage was blessed with a daughter, Kafui Nyamadi. The couple later welcomed another child, but sadly, he did not live long and returned to his Maker at a tender age.

Life continued, bringing with it both beautiful moments and painful seasons. In 1997, Dadaa Kate suffered another great loss when her husband, Daniel, passed away. Having already known loss from a young age, she once again had to find the strength to continue. Through these different seasons, she remained devoted to her family and carried on with determination.

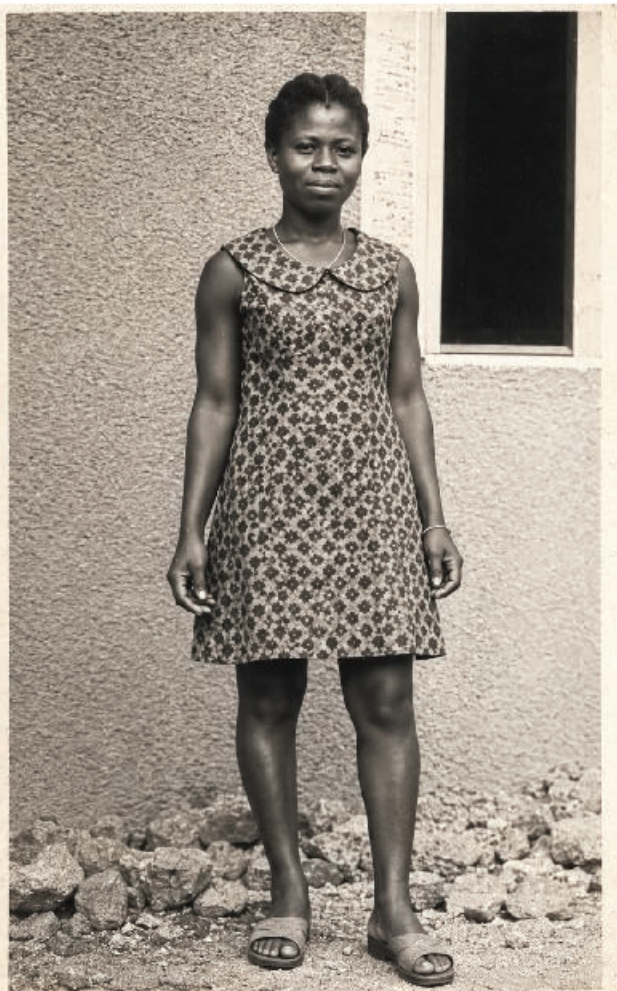

Like many hardworking women of her generation, Dadaa Kate engaged in different forms of trading to earn a living and support her family. At one point, she sold koko and later traded in several other items while moving between Accra, Adaiso, Ho and other places. She eventually settled in Accra for a longer period and became particularly known for selling the small fish popularly called Keta School Boys. Her working life reflected her determination and willingness to make the best of whatever she had. Penny after penny and pesewa after pesewa, she worked hard to provide for herself and her family.

Dadaa Kate took her Christian faith just as seriously as she took her work. Her relationship with the Apostles Revelation Society had roots stretching back to her childhood, and the church remained an important part of her life as she grew older.

While living in Accra, she fellowshiped with the Apostles Revelation Society (A.R.S.), Abelenkpe Branch, and when she was in Ho, she worshipped at Edem. Even from the little she earned through trading, she faithfully put aside her pennies and pesewas for her tithe and the work of God.

At a young age, Dadaa Kate joined the church choir, where her melodious voice was noticed and appreciated. Singing and worship remained important parts of her Christian life wherever she went. Her devotion to the A.R.S. also became part of her family's life, with the family maintaining its connection to the church over the years.

Her commitment to the annual A.R.S. convention was particularly well known among her family. Her preparations for convention were taken seriously, and year after year, she remained consistent. She would often leave for the convention with her grandson a day before its official commencement, while her child and the rest of her grandchildren joined later.

For Dadaa Kate, the annual convention was not simply another church programme; it was an important part of her faith and something she genuinely looked forward to each year.

In 2017, after many years of working and caring for herself and her family, Dadaa Kate was encouraged to retire from active work so that her children and grandchildren could take care of her. She subsequently settled at Banana Inn, Accra, where she spent the remaining years of her life surrounded by her family.

As life has its times and seasons, the years went by and strength gradually began distancing itself from her. This brought more frequent hospital visits. Even during those changing years, Dadaa Kate often spoke of how God had blessed her with long life. Indeed, she was grateful for the years she had been given, although her health became increasingly challenging as she grew older.

In July 2026, Dadaa Kate was taken to the hospital after her appetite began to decline. Medical examinations were conducted, and she received treatment and medication. Her family remained hopeful that her health and strength would improve and that they would be blessed with more time together.

Unfortunately, August brought a cold wave the family was not prepared for. On Wednesday, 12 August 2026, Dadaa Kate's earthly journey came to an end. Her passing was officially declared at Mamprobi Polyclinic, Accra, at the age of 78.

If wishes were horses, this occasion would have happened sometime far in the future and not today. Her family would gladly have asked for another year, another month, another week, or simply another opportunity to sit with her and listen to the stories she had told many times before. But as we are reminded, life has its times and seasons, and God knows best.

Dadaa Kate's life will be remembered for far more than the day she departed. She will be remembered as a hardworking trader who made the best of what she had; a devoted wife and mother who endured both joy and loss; a loving grandmother and great-grandmother; and a woman whose faith remained an important part of her life.

She will also be remembered for her melodious voice, her years in the church choir, her dedication to the annual A.R.S. convention, her determination in the face of life's changing seasons, and the many ordinary moments through which she touched the lives of her family and those around her.

After a lifetime of working, travelling, trading, singing, worshipping, caring for her family and faithfully walking her journey,

God has called His own home to rest. Her earthly voice may now be silent, but the memories of the life she lived will remain with those who knew and loved her.

Dadaa Kate, rest peacefully in the bosom of your Maker until we meet again.

and she would answer, “Yasoo.”

TRIBUTE BY HER DAUGHTER — KAFUI NYAMADI

Dadaa,

There are some things in life you know will happen one day, but knowing does not prepare you for the day they finally happen.

I have known you all my life. Before I became a mother myself, before my children came and before our family became what it is today, I was first your daughter. And now, I am being asked to say goodbye to you.

We went through many seasons together. There were good days and difficult days, moments of understanding and moments when, like every mother and daughter, we did not always see things the same way. But through all of it, one truth never changed: you were my mother, and I was your child.

Life asked a lot of you. You knew what it meant to experience loss and still find the

Dadaa,

There are some things in life you know will happen one day, but knowing does not prepare you for the day they finally happen.

I have known you all my life. Before I became a mother myself, before my children came and before our family became what it is today, I was first your daughter. And now, I am being asked to say goodbye to you.

We went through many seasons together. There were good days and difficult days, moments of understanding and moments when, like every mother and daughter, we did not always see things the same way. But through all of it, one truth never changed: you were my mother, and I was your child.

Life asked a lot of you. You knew what it meant to experience loss and still find the strength to continue. When we lost Daddy, Daniel Nyamadi, in 1997, life changed again, but somehow we continued.

Then I grew older. I became a mother too, and you became Dadaa to my children. I watched the relationship I had known as mother and daughter grow into something bigger. My children developed their own relationship with you, their own stories, their own memories and their own version of who Dadaa was.

As the years passed, our roles slowly began to change. The woman who had spent so much of her life taking care of others gradually needed us to take care of her. When you stopped working and settled at Banana Inn, caring for you became part of our everyday lives.

There were hospital visits, difficult days and moments of worry. There were also moments when we simply hoped everything would return to normal.

Through it all, you kept reminding us that you had been blessed with long life.

You were right, Mummy. Seventy-eight years is a blessing. But I have discovered that when it is your mother, no number of years ever feels like enough.

On 12 August 2026, I lost the woman who gave me life.

Others may remember the church woman, the trader, the relative or friend they knew. My children will remember the grandmother they called Dadaa. But I will always remember my mother.

There are conversations I wish we could have again. There are things I wish I had asked. There are ordinary moments that did not seem important at the time but suddenly mean so much because they cannot happen again.

Today, I am not only saying goodbye. I am also saying thank you.

Thank you for giving me life. Thank you for the years we were given together. Thank you for being Dadaa to my children and for living long enough for another generation of our family to know you.

I will carry what belongs to me as your daughter for the rest of my life.

Mummy, you have finished your journey. Rest now.

And when we speak of you to those who come after us, they will know that before you became Dadaa to them, you were my mother.

Farewell, Mummy. May you rest peacefully in the bosom of your Maker.

Dzudzo le ntifafa me.

TRIBUTE BY GRANDCHILDREN

I know the rest of the grandchildren will have a lot to say about Dadaa, but permit me to be selfish, just this once.

Before I, Michael Mawumenyo Agbozo, came to understand life and the world around me, there was one person who, to the best of my memory, had always been there: my grandmother.

To us, she was simply Dadaa.

She had been such a permanent figure in my life that I never really imagined a version of life in which she would no longer be here. When someone has always been there, you somehow begin to believe they always will be.

Some childhood memories have faded with time, but strangely, the little ones involving Dadaa have stayed.

I still remember being about four years old and being with her at a place where kenkey was being prepared. I cried because I also wanted to make some. Eventually, Dadaa gave me a small portion to mould by myself. I remember how imperfect that little ball of kenkey was. It looked nothing like what everyone else had made, but somehow, it was accepted and went into the pot with the rest to be cooked.

It was such a small moment, but all these years later, I still remember it. And now that she is gone, memories like that have become some of the things I hold closest.

Growing up, I was practically Dadaa's handbag. Wherever she went, that small boy was usually somewhere around her. Whenever she visited, there was one thing I knew was almost guaranteed: my GH¢1. At the time, that GH¢1 felt like a fortune in my little hands. Today, I would give far more than that just to experience one of those ordinary visits again.

Dadaa and I also walked a long journey through church together. She took her faith seriously, and being a child was never an excuse for me to escape the rules of the church. Every Saturday night, she would make sure she had biscuits ready for the next day's service because we did not buy things on Sundays.

Then there were her prayers.

I remember being beside her while she prayed. Dadaa could pray for what felt to me like hours and hours. As a little boy, somewhere along the way, I would become tired and fall asleep while she continued praying, sometimes with part of her hand resting on me.

Back then, I used to wonder why the prayers had to be so long. I did not understand why she had so much to tell God.

Today, I would give almost anything to hear one of those long prayers again.

As the years passed, the little boy grew up and started working, but Dadaa never stopped looking out for me.

I remember the days when work would keep me out a little late. When I finally got home, I would sometimes find Dadaa by the door, waiting and watching to see if the person coming home was me. By then, I was grown, but somehow, in her eyes, I was still that little boy she needed to make sure had returned home safely.

I did not think much of it then. It was simply Dadaa being Dadaa.

Now, I know there will be days when I come home and look towards that door, only to remember that she will no longer be there waiting.

As I grew older, life changed and responsibilities changed. The little boy who followed Dadaa everywhere became a man. But somehow, I never stopped being that little boy around her.

So, if over the years you ever saw Dadaa walking around with a small boy beside her and wondered, "Who is that boy who is always with her?" I announce myself today. That little boy was me.

Today, I stand with my siblings, Godwin Nayram Agbozo, Esther Exornam Agbozo and Benjamin Edem Agbozo, to say goodbye to a woman whose presence has been woven into our lives for as long as we can remember.

There are many things we will miss about you, Dadaa. Some are big, but many are painfully small: your routines, your rules, your church preparations, your prayers, the things you said over and over again, waiting by the door, and simply having the comfort of knowing that somewhere, Dadaa was there. Perhaps that is what makes losing you so difficult. You were not someone who occasionally appeared in our lives. You were part of the life itself.

And now we are being asked to learn how to continue that life without you physically in it.

Dadaa, thank you for the childhood you helped give us. Thank you for the discipline. Thank you for taking us to church. Thank you for the prayers we sometimes slept through without understanding their value. Thank you for the little gifts that felt enormous in our small hands. Thank you for waiting for us to come home. And thank you for the memories we did not know we needed to treasure while we were making them.

There are things I wish I had asked you. There are conversations I wish had lasted longer. There are stories you told over and over again that I once thought I had heard enough times.

Now, I wish I could hear them just one more time.

The small boy who walked beside you has grown now, Dadaa, but he remembers.

He remembers the kenkey. He remembers the GH¢1. He remembers the Saturday biscuits. He remembers falling asleep while you prayed. He remembers seeing you waiting by the door.

And most of all, he remembers you.

Rest peacefully, Dadaa.

The little boy remembers. And your grandchildren will never forget you.

TRIBUTE FROM THE FAMILY

There are some people whose presence becomes so familiar within a family that we rarely stop to imagine what life would be like without them. For us, Dadaa Kate was one of those people.

For many years, she occupied her own place in our family story. Through changing seasons, growing families, celebrations, difficulties and losses, she remained part of the thread that connected one generation to another.

Today, that familiar place is empty.

Dadaa Kate knew both the kindness and the difficulties of life. She experienced loss from an early age, travelled through different places and seasons, built a family of her own, and faced circumstances that required her to keep moving even when the road was difficult.

That ability to carry on became part of who she was.

Within the family, we knew her in different ways. To some, she was a sister. To others, an aunt, a mother, a grandmother, a great-grandmother or simply Dadaa. Each relationship came with its own memories, and no single tribute can fully tell the story that each person carries.

There were ordinary moments we never thought we would one day miss. Family conversations, visits, familiar expressions, disagreements that eventually passed, laughter, advice, and simply knowing that she was somewhere within reach.

These are the things death suddenly makes precious.

For 78 years, Dadaa Kate was given a place in this family. She watched generations come after her. She saw children become adults, grandchildren grow, and even had the blessing of seeing another generation added to the family.

We knew that age was advancing. We saw her strength gradually decline. We knew, as every family knows, that no one remains with us forever.

But knowing this does not make goodbye easier.

On 12 August 2026, we lost someone who had been part of our family for longer than many of us have been alive. Her passing did not only take away a person; it closed a chapter of our shared history.

Today, as we prepare to lay her to rest, we choose to remember not only the sadness of her departure but the years we were fortunate enough to have her among us.

Dadaa Kate, the family you leave behind will continue to tell your story. Your name will remain in our conversations, your memories will remain in our homes, and those who come after us will know that you were here and that you were part of us.

Your place among us may now be empty, but your place in this family can never be replaced.

Farewell, Dadaa Kate.

May your journey end in perfect peace, and may the Lord receive you into His eternal rest.

Dzudzɔ le ntifafa me.

TRIBUTE FROM THE IN-LAWS

There are families we are born into, and there are families we become part of along life's journey. Through marriage, our paths became connected with Dadaa Kate, but with time, the word "in-law" became too small to describe the relationship we shared.

To us, she became family.

Coming into another family means learning its people, its ways, its stories and the relationships that existed long before you arrived. In Dadaa, we found someone whose life had already travelled through many seasons and whose presence had become deeply rooted in the family.

We came to know her not only through the stories told about her, but through the ordinary moments we were privileged to share with her ourselves.

There was something special about watching a family grow around her. The woman who had once raised her own child lived to see grandchildren and a great-grandchild become part of the family. With every new person who entered, the family became larger, but Dadaa remained one of its familiar faces.

Over time, we stopped thinking of ourselves as people who had simply married into her family. Her joys became our joys, her difficult moments concerned us, and when her strength began to decline, we shared in the family's concern for her.

That is perhaps one of the beautiful things about family: sometimes it begins through blood, sometimes through marriage, but with time, care and shared experiences make the distinction less important.

Today, we feel that truth more deeply.

We do not stand outside this loss as in-laws looking in. We stand together with the family, mourning someone who had also become ours.

Dadaa, there are relationships we assume will always have more time. Another visit, another family gathering, another conversation, another opportunity to see the familiar face we have grown accustomed to.

Then suddenly, time says otherwise.

Your passing reminds us that the people who become part of our everyday lives are gifts we often understand most clearly when we are called to say goodbye.

Thank you, Dadaa, for the years we were privileged to share with you. Thank you for the place you allowed us to have in the family, and for the memories we now carry with us.

We may have entered your life through marriage, but we do not say goodbye to you merely as in-laws.

We say goodbye as family.

May the Lord receive you into His eternal rest.

Farewell, Dadaa.
